BAR TATTI

In a City of Reservations, Bar Tatti Wants Copenhagen to Just Show Up

Every Wednesday, the lively Italian bar on Store Regnegade skips the bookings and the dinner plans. Order a drink and Alberto sends out pasta.

COPENHAGEN — November 2026 — Copenhagen has become one of Europe's great restaurant cities. But somewhere between tasting menus, online bookings and planning dinner three weeks ahead, going out for something to eat has become surprisingly complicated.

On Wednesday nights, Bar Tatti is trying something different. There are no tickets, beyond a drink and, importantly, no reservations.

From 17:30 to 21:30, guests simply walk into the Italian café bar on Store Regnegade, order whatever they feel like drinking and find a place at the bar or around a table.

Then Alberto brings out a seasonal pasta, on the house.

> "We didn't want to create another event people have to plan for," says owner Alberto Tatti. "I am bringing the aperitivo ritual to Copenhagen. Order a drink and the pasta is gratis. Settle in with a beverage, some food comes out and suddenly you have ten people around a table. That's the feeling we are creating."

Aperitivo isn't happy hour. It isn't dinner. And it isn't really about getting something for free. It is an excuse to come together.

So on Wednesdays, Bar Tatti provides the excuse.

Some guests come for one drink. Others stay for the evening. Regulars mix with neighbors and people walking in for the first time. Tables get shared, plates of pasta move through the room and conversations start between people who didn't arrive together. Over time, new faces become familiar ones. That is partly the point.

Tatti grew up on the shores of Lake Como before spending more than 30 years in hospitality in New York City, Palm Beach, the Hamptons and Miami. He has since become enough of a fixture on Store Regnegade that regulars have nicknamed him the "Mayor of Store Regnegade."

His Copenhagen bar is built around a similarly old fashioned idea of hospitality: that a good bar should make you feel welcome, know a few people when you arrive, and probably know a few more when you leave.

Pasta Night might be the purest expression of it.

Order a drink. Eat some pasta. Talk to whoever is sitting next to you.

And maybe don't make plans for afterwards.

ABOUT BAR TATTI
Italian at heart and unmistakably Copenhagen, Bar Tatti is an intimate Italian café bar in central Copenhagen inspired by the relaxed rhythm of bars in Milano. Open Tuesday through Saturday from 09:30 to midnight and Sunday and Monday from 11:00 to 18:00, it moves from espresso and food during the day to aperitivo, Italian wine and cocktails at night.

Tutti a Tatti. Everyone at Tatti's.
